In winter, Iceland vacillates between edgy darkness and shimmering twilight. In summer, Norway's northern reaches bask in the muted glow of the midnight sun. In these opposite seasons, even the most stoic will find these two Scandinavian destinations downright romantic.

These are places that hold an intrinsic ambience—a kind of “you and me together in this big, wide world” sentiment. There’s the notion of remote seclusion: Both destinations are very north. Iceland kisses the Arctic Circle. Norway’s province of Finnmark dances above it.
